

PUBLIC SIGNAL REVIEW

The returns page is one of On's few direct moments with a reseller customer.

On sells through its own channels and a wide retail network. Its returns page correctly directs non-direct purchases back to the original retailer. The growth opportunity is not to absorb every reseller return, but to make that hand-off helpful and permission-based.

THE WIDER LESSON

A necessary service boundary does not have to become a relationship dead end.

What is publicly visible

OBSERVED 01

Direct and reseller returns are separated

On states that products not bought directly from On cannot be returned or exchanged on its website and should go back to the original seller.

OBSERVED 02

The page already supports direct relationship tools

The same experience offers account access, help, membership and an email subscription. On therefore has mechanisms to continue a relationship without taking over the retailer's obligation.

What the evidence may mean — and what would disprove it

POSSIBLE IMPLICATION

A hypothesis, not a verdict

A reseller customer arriving with a service need is showing high intent and product ownership. A clearer hand-off could solve the task first, then invite a direct relationship without undermining the retail partner.

ALTERNATIVE EXPLANATION

A credible reason the signal may be benign

On may deliberately avoid collecting data at this point to protect partner relationships and minimise consent complexity. Reseller-return traffic may also be too small to justify bespoke work.

SMALLEST USEFUL TEST

Learn before committing to a larger fix

Add a retailer-finder and a neutral return checklist before any marketing prompt. Then test an optional product-care or fit guide sign-up, segmented as reseller-owned, and measure help completion rather than discount redemption.

What to check internally

- 01 How much return-page traffic comes from reseller customers?
- 02 Which retailer information is available from receipts or order formats?
- 03 Can On help without appearing to take ownership of the return?
- 04 What permission would make a future direct relationship appropriate?
