

Drip Water's strongest sustainability proof is already public. The opportunity is making it coherent.

An evidence-led review of public touchpoints, not an assessment of internal performance.

THE WIDER LESSON

Operational proof only becomes a marketing advantage when people can find it at the point of decision.

The evidence does not show a weak sustainability story. It shows a strong proof point, a current sport and community proposition, and a changing web presence appearing in different public places.

OBSERVED 01

A specific sustainability action exists

The Grocer reported that Drip repurposed aluminium bottles from the defunct Almighty Water brand. Drip said the action prevented 80,000

Confidence: High, dated trade coverage attributed to Drip.

OBSERVED 02

The public journey is distributed

Drip's official LinkedIn profile lists thedrip.vip and current sport positioning. Recent posts use an @thedrip.vip address. Separately, dripwater.co.uk is a 'Launching Soon' page.

Confidence: High for what is public, not for strategic intent.

POSSIBLE IMPLICATION

The proof may be harder to discover than necessary

Customers, buyers and partners can find the story, the current proposition and a route back to the brand, but not necessarily in one place or in a clear sequence. This may dilute a distinctive proof point. It does not prove confusion or lost sales.

ALTERNATIVE EXPLANATION

The fragmentation may be temporary or deliberate

Drip may be migrating domains, prioritising wholesale and events, or using social channels as its primary storefront. Internal acquisition data and domain plans are needed before recommending a larger rebuild.

THE SMALLEST USEFUL TEST

Give the proof one canonical home

Build one evidence-led page on the intended long-term domain. Connect the 80,000-bottle decision to Drip's sport and community proposition, then measure visits from packaging, social and partners separately.
